U.S. Court Values Cybersecurity Patents at Nearly $2 Billion, but Why?

by Elliot C. Cook & Jeffrey A. Berkowitz

In a closely watched infringement case in which Centripetal Networks asserted cybersecurity patents against Cisco, a U.S. court in Virginia recently awarded to Centripetal $1.9 billion in damages. Everything about the case is attention-grabbing, from the staggering damages to the mechanics of the trial, which was conducted over 22 days entirely by videoconference. While the case is unusual in its scope and complexity, it teaches important lessons about patent damages that cybersecurity professionals should understand. Click here to read more.

A Brief History of Virtual Reality, in Patents

by Rajeev Gupta, Ph.D.; Karthik Kumar, Ph.D.; Soniya Shah

Until recently, the idea of wearing a headset and becoming part of a virtual world seemed like something out of a science fiction movie. While modern day virtual reality and augmented reality use cases promise revolutionary undertakings in mobile applications, gaming, healthcare, retail, automotive, and enterprise industries, the technology has a long history that dates to the 1940s. Click here to learn more on the history of virtual reality in patents.

Covid may stop us from riding, but it will not stop Finnegan from supporting Jerusalem's ALYN Hospital

For the past seven years, Finnegan has proudly supported ALYN - a hospital dedicated to the rehabilitation of children with congenital conditions. While we can't travel to Israel to join this year's ride, if you are an Israeli, we encourage you to participate. And if you can't - please donate. ALYN needs our support!
